This could be a story of many middle-class households, at least the ones I have seen around.

- The grandparents' generation focused on survival, with minimal education and the pressure to start earning as soon as possible. They had no assets or owned homes.
- †† The parents' generation overcame survival mode, attaining sustainability through decent education, acquiring some assets, and owning a home, at least towards retirement.
- Our generation is well-educated, earning well, and has accumulated decent assets, including extra homes. Our children can pursue higher studies abroad without the immediate burden of earning.
- This is a time when they can explore fields that our and previous generations could not afford. They can "go crazy" and explore to find their niche. However, they should consider making it on their own and avoid becoming dependent on parents forever.

Some grounding thoughts I wish to suggest:

If you choose an unusual field, you will need to be exceptionally better. For example, to make a good fortune as a guitar player, you need to be among the top few. The rest struggle to make a living. But in conventional fields like software or engineering, many, even those with average abilities, make a decent living.

* Test your choice against the concept of #Ikigai – do you love it?, are you good at it?, does the world need it?, and importantly, is the world willing to pay for it?

- * The more unique, niche, and specific your pursuit becomes, the riskier it is, but also potentially more rewarding.
- Whatever your domain, learn #programming and gain a decent understanding of #ArtificialIntelligence, as these skills are increasingly valuable across industries.
